

i moved here in 2001 for the quiet villiage life. its not the prettiest place but it suits me and my wife.

assuming 1500 homes have 4 people per home, that makes 6000 more people! add to that the 1800 who live here, that makes 7800.

then when you consider that travellers have their own set of rules - it doesnt matter how many official pitches you give, they will simply do what they want. history shows us that travellers are pretty uncooth, uneducated and lawless. not suprising is it that no-one wants them near the villiage.

so all in all, this isnt such a great idea.

as for the 1500 new homes, im happy if they are all priced at £1m. that will bring a good quality of person into the villiage. the last thing an owner occupier wants is an influx of council tennants. employed people make better tennants and therefor better neighbours. can you imagine having 1500 families where the state picks up the bill for their lifestyle? my wife has worked so hard to pay the mortgage. can you think of anything worse than being told your house is now worth a fraction of its value because of the type of person that has been projected in to the villiage? history shows that property values dip considerably when either travellers or state dependant families live near by. you may consider these views as right wing. well, im no facist niether do i care for the left. when i see car car coming at me - i move out the way. its simply a survivalists natrual instinct. im sure you understand this.

so, where are we?

im not paid to advise the council on an alternative.

you want a reaction - i have given you one.
